At 8:45 that morning, the Marines were notified that North Korean forces had crossed the 38th Parallel at 4 a.m. A few of the Marines were sent to the main railroad station to pick up embassy staffers who were arriving from Pusan (now Busan) and to alert embassy families in outlying residences that the decision had made to evacuate all dependents.

By the afternoon of the 25th, the Marines began burning classified material. Due to the amount of material to be destroyed, not only were the embassy basement furnaces used, but the Marines also built a homemade wire cage to burn documents in the parking lot.

The next morning (26th), the Marines were tasked with destroying all embassy vehicles by firing rounds from their M-1s and Browning Automatic Rifles (BARs) into the engine blocks. Due to the size of the motor pool, it took several hours to destroy them all. During this time, American dependents and nonessential employees were assembling at the embassy for evacuation. The Marines escorted and controlled the bus convoy to Incheon, where the women and children boarded the only available ship and were sent to Japan.

On the 27th, the Marines escorted the remaining nonessential personnel to the Kimpo airfield. Once they returned to the embassy, they finished burning all classified material, destroyed switchboards, and disabled code machines. They were then instructed to head south to Pusan in the only jeeps still operational.

George Lampman, who would retire from the Corps in July of 1967, is one of two surviving members of the 20-person Marine Security Guard Detachment at Embassy Seoul (1949-1950).
